1917?

The fugitives hung themselves into these battalions and bore them back. The battalions were untrained men. All again was rout along the road—rout and panic.

Then the shrapnel no longer reached them; it was breaking behind; but still, like harried sheep, the fugitives from the battle ran on. Jim Ashby, with others who had been officers, tried to block the road and turn the men, but the rout had gone too far. Officers of the staff rode up and gave their commands. It was no use to attempt to drive those fugitives back to battle. Retreat was ordered. The lines would be formed from Lake Ontario to Cayuga Lake, which could be controlled so as to flood the valley toward Ontario; south of Cayuga the line met the mountains and ran along the Susquehanna.

Jim Ashby halted for rest that night with a dozen followers in an open field, without fire and without food and without shelter. The remnants of the regulars and the rest who had stood and sacrificed themselves to cover the rout had been swept from existence hours before. The regular cavalry was on the roads, his armed motor cars and motor machine gun companies were following the fugitives, and those who were not captured or shot down were broken into little, helpless bands.

It was cold; frost was in the air. Most of the men were without caps—overcoats had not been issued to the American troops and blankets were back on the battlefield.

The houses near by were the homes of their people—Americans for whom they had fought or at least tried to fight. But the fugitives dared not go to the houses. The regiment's cavalry men were billeted all about; their horses were in the barns under guard; their motor patrols were in the yards; they had guards on all the roads with rifles and machine guns. The fugitives, most of them, had no weapons at all.

After midnight Jim found a farm house which he dared approach. He begged food for his band; and he also got blankets. The men ate and tried to crawl into the barn or lie down on the ground in the blankets, but Jim drove them on till dawn; then, hidden in a clump of trees, he let them sleep.

Agony and disaster such as he had seen in New York—and about New York as he worked his way toward the American lines—were more than he had imagined might exist. Yet men and women and children by the million had suffered the agony as part of the first defense of the nation, to win time to assemble and make ready an army. Now the army, assembled at that overwhelming sacrifice, had fought or tried to fight and—disaster added to disaster.

The favored materials are broadcloth, gabardine, whipcords, velour cloth, and serge. Most all the suits show the Russian blouse effect and many are trimmed with fur. But while fur trimming predominates, it is often substituted by velvet or plush.

Length of coats vary. Skirts range from 2½ to 3½ yards wide around the bottom. Select your suit now, while you can choose from so many new and beautiful styles.
